Public Relations:

1. Finished posting content from our October newsletter to the website. This process was stunted by an ongoing intermittent outage from CivicLive, our website developer/host. After several very long phone calls and waiting on hold, I requested that the company improve its communication of these kinds of technical problems. They finally did respond later in the week. Their report of the incident goes as follows:

   What Happened
   A sophisticated DDoS (distributed denial of service) attack impacted server processing capabilities and intermittently reduced the ability to load legitimate site traffic at multiple times over the past several days.

   As our team analyzed logs over the last few days, increases in connection attempts that coincide with periods of impact were identified. Upon inspection of the connection attempts, it became clear that they were not highly volumetric, nor were they originating from a large number of unique sources. These characteristics make attacks of this nature difficult to detect by industry-leading attack scrubbing platforms such as the ones we use.

   These types of attacks are purposely designed to send traffic at a rate that is just below the threshold at which attack detection will become active. As such, they have been characterized as “low and slow” attacks by carriers. More information on this type of attack can be found here.

   What We Are Doing for the Future
   In response to these findings, we have tuned session related settings at both the load balancer and firewall layers in order to ensure resources remain available to better handle such attacks. The team remains vigilant and committed to closely monitoring the environment.

   West and partner technical teams continue to analyze historical data, work with traffic scrubbing suppliers on improved detection, and develop improved reporting capabilities.

   At this time, all CivicLive sites are stable. Thank you again for your patience and understanding through these recent events.
